5. Good manners are not only for face-to-face situations. As we spend more time online, “netiquette” — internet etiquette — has become just as important. Writing in capital letters, for example, looks like shouting and can seem aggressive. Replying to a group chat late at night may disturb people who are sleeping. Before sharing a photo of someone, it is polite to ask for their permission. In emails to teachers or employers, using a greeting and a clear subject line shows respect. Finally, remember that tone is easily misunderstood in writing; a short message like “OK.” may sound cold, even if you didn’t mean it to.
