12. Before a major film reaches cinemas, it is often shown to small test audiences. These viewers, who are chosen to represent the film's target audience, fill in questionnaires about the characters, the plot and especially the ending. If the reactions are strongly negative, studios may decide to reshoot certain scenes or even change the ending completely. Some directors criticise this practice, arguing that it turns art into a product designed by committee. Studios, however, point out that a single film can cost hundreds of millions of dollars, so they cannot afford to ignore audience opinion.
