11. A large study of social media found that false news stories spread significantly faster and further than true ones. The researchers, who examined thousands of stories shared over ten years, concluded that this was not mainly the fault of automated accounts, or “bots”. Instead, real users were more likely to share false stories, probably because these stories were more surprising and emotional. The researchers suggested that people should pause before sharing a story and ask themselves where it came from. They also argued that schools should teach media literacy so that young people can recognise misleading headlines.
