It’s Saturday morning, and the Science Festival in Eskişehir is very busy. In one tent, children are doing experiments with magnets. In another, a group of students from Erzurum is showing a robot that can clean classrooms. Outside, a man is launching water rockets into the sky, and everyone is cheering.

Last year, Melis, an eighth-grader from Bilecik, won first prize at the festival with her solar-powered lunch box. She invented it because her food was always cold at school. This year, she is helping visitors at the solar energy stand. ‘I learned a lot from my mistakes,’ she says. ‘My first three models didn’t work at all!’

> Science labs are exciting places, but they can also be dangerous. That’s why safety rules are so important. First of all, always wear safety goggles and a lab coat when you do an experiment, because chemicals can burn your eyes and skin. Second, never eat or drink in the lab, because food can mix with dangerous substances. Third, read the instructions carefully before you start, and ask your teacher if you don’t understand something. Finally, clean your desk and wash your hands when you finish. If there is an accident, tell your teacher immediately, even if it seems small. Following these rules protects you and everyone around you.

Most tornadoes happen in the United States, in an area called ‘Tornado Alley’, but small tornadoes sometimes happen in Türkiye too, especially near the Mediterranean coast in autumn and winter.
