17. Music therapy is a clinical practice in which trained therapists use music to help patients reach health goals. It is not simply about listening to pleasant songs; patients may sing, write lyrics, play simple instruments or move to rhythm. Research suggests that music therapy can reduce anxiety in hospital patients, improve the speech of people recovering from strokes and help children with autism communicate more easily. One reason it works, scientists believe, is that music activates several areas of the brain at once, including those linked to memory, emotion and movement. However, therapists warn that music is not a magic cure. It works best when it is combined with other treatments and adapted to the needs of each patient.
