17. Psychologists have long argued that close friendships are good for our health. People with strong social ties tend to recover from illness faster and report lower levels of stress. In recent years, however, researchers have started to ask whether online friendships offer the same benefits. A recent study of 2,000 teenagers found that online friends could provide valuable emotional support, especially for young people who felt isolated at school. Yet the same study showed that face-to-face contact remained important: teenagers who met their friends in person at least once a week felt happier than those who communicated only through screens. The researchers concluded that online friendships should be seen as a complement to, not a replacement for, real-life relationships.

According to the passage, people with strong social ties ----.

a) rarely get ill
