17. Every day, millions of stories are shared on social media, and not all of them are true. Fake news can spread six times faster than accurate information, according to one study, because it is often designed to shock or anger readers. To avoid being misled, experts recommend a few simple habits. First, look at the source: is it a well-known news organisation, or a website you have never heard of? Second, read beyond the headline, as headlines are sometimes written to attract clicks rather than to inform. Third, check whether other reliable sources are reporting the same story. Finally, be suspicious of stories that make you feel very emotional; that reaction is exactly what the creators of fake news are hoping for.

According to the passage, fake news spreads quickly because ----.
