17. A growing number of people are taking part in “digital detox” programmes, in which they give up their smartphones, tablets and computers for a set period of time. Some spend a weekend in a remote cabin with no internet connection; others simply switch off their phones every evening after eight o’clock. Participants commonly report sleeping better, feeling more focused and having deeper conversations with family and friends. Nevertheless, critics point out that a short break may not lead to lasting change. They argue that it is more effective to build healthy habits into daily life, such as turning off unnecessary notifications or keeping phones out of the bedroom, than to disconnect completely for a few days and then return to old routines.
