11. For years, Kaan believed that being a good student meant studying until midnight. In tenth grade, he slept five hours a night, skipped breakfast and spent his weekends with test books. His grades were not bad, but he often felt exhausted and anxious, and he started getting headaches. One day, his school counsellor asked him a simple question: “When did you last do something just for fun?” Kaan couldn’t remember. With the counsellor’s help, he made a new plan. He started going to bed before eleven, eating a proper breakfast and playing basketball twice a week. He also used a technique called “time blocking”: he studied in 40-minute blocks with ten-minute breaks and no phone on the desk. Surprisingly, he studied fewer hours but learned more. Three months later, his headaches had disappeared and his marks had gone up. Now Kaan tells younger students that rest is not a waste of time; it is part of learning.
