11. Long before smartphones and cameras, people in Anatolia recorded their lives in a very different way: on walls and in clay. At Çatalhöyük, one of the oldest known settlements in the world, archaeologists have found paintings of hunting scenes, wild animals and even what some believe to be a map of the village with a volcano behind it. The people who lived there around 9,000 years ago did not have streets; instead, they entered their mud-brick houses through holes in the roofs. They buried their family members under the floors of their homes, which suggests that they wanted to keep their ancestors close. Interestingly, the houses were all similar in size, so many researchers think that the community was fairly equal and had no rich ruling class. Studying such places helps us understand how humans moved from hunting to farming and how the first communities were organized.
