12. Many people think that the main benefit of team sports is physical fitness. While this is certainly true, research suggests that the psychological and social benefits may be just as important, especially for teenagers. When young people play in a team, they learn to communicate under pressure, accept defeat and celebrate other people's success. A study following students for several years found that those who took part in team sports were less likely to report feelings of loneliness and anxiety later in life. However, the researchers also pointed out a risk: when coaches and parents focus only on winning, sport can become a source of stress rather than joy. The best programmes, they concluded, are those that value effort and teamwork more than results.
