6. When a local newspaper in a small coastal town reported that the town's only bakery was about to close, nobody expected what happened next. The owner, 78-year-old Mr. Remzi, had run the bakery for more than fifty years, but rising costs and health problems had made it impossible for him to continue. Within hours of the story being published online, residents began organizing. A retired accountant offered to manage the finances for free, two high school students created a social media campaign, and dozens of neighbours volunteered to work early morning shifts. In just three weeks, enough money was raised to repair the old oven and pay the bills for six months. Mr. Remzi, who had planned to sell the building, was moved to tears. "I have baked bread for this town all my life," he told reporters, "and now the town is returning the favour." Journalists later called the story an example of "good news that spreads as fast as bad news."
