15. Every year, millions of old phones, laptops and tablets are thrown away. This electronic waste, or e-waste, is the fastest-growing type of rubbish in the world. Old devices contain valuable materials such as gold and copper, but they also contain dangerous substances like lead and mercury. When e-waste is dumped in landfills or burned, these chemicals can pollute soil and water and damage human health. Unfortunately, only a small proportion of e-waste is officially collected and recycled. One reason is that many people keep their old phones in drawers, not knowing what to do with them. Another is that recycling electronics properly is complicated and expensive. Some companies now offer discounts to customers who return their old devices, and several countries have passed laws that make manufacturers responsible for collecting and recycling the products they sell.
