> Psychologists say that friendship is one of the key factors in human happiness. A long-term study that followed hundreds of adults for decades found that people with close relationships lived longer and healthier lives than those who were lonely. Interestingly, the number of friends did not matter as much as the quality of the friendships. Having two or three people you can trust completely seems to be more valuable than having hundreds of followers on social media. Experts also point out that friendships need effort: we should keep in touch, listen carefully and be there for our friends in difficult times.
