When Lena, an exchange student from Germany, arrived in Gaziantep last September, she expected to feel lonely. Instead, she was surprised by how social life was in her host family's neighbourhood. Neighbours dropped by without calling first, and nobody left a house without drinking at least one glass of tea. At first, Lena found this a little tiring because in her hometown people usually plan visits in advance. But soon she started to enjoy it.

Her favourite day became Thursday, when the women of the street cooked together for a local charity. Lena learned to make stuffed vine leaves and even taught her neighbours a German apple cake recipe. She also noticed differences in daily life: shops stayed open late, and families ate dinner much later than in Germany.

Before she returned home in June, the neighbours organized a farewell party for her. "I came to learn a language," she says, "but I learned about community."

1. Lena expected to feel lonely in Gaziantep. ( )
2. In Lena's hometown, people usually visit each other without planning. ( )
3. On Thursdays, women in the street cooked for a charity. ( )
4. Lena didn't share any food from her own culture. ( )
