When Tuna joined our class in October, nobody talked to him. He was very tall and thin, with long dark hair and a serious face. He always wore a black jacket and never smiled. Some students said he was unfriendly and rude. I believed them, too. One day, our teacher put us in the same group for a science project. I wasn’t happy about it. But I was wrong about Tuna. He was quiet, but he was also clever, patient and very funny. He explained difficult topics in a simple way. I learned that he was shy because he moved schools three times in two years. Now Tuna is one of my best friends. I learned an important lesson: you can’t understand people from their appearance.
