> Twenty years ago, if you told your teacher you wanted to be a social media manager, a drone pilot or an app developer, they probably would not understand you. These jobs simply did not exist. Today, they are common, and experts believe that many of the jobs you will do in the future have not been invented yet. So how can young people prepare for jobs that do not exist? According to career advisers, the answer is to focus on skills, not only on job titles. Digital skills are important, of course, but so are skills that machines cannot easily copy. Creativity, problem-solving and the ability to work in a team are becoming more valuable. Employers also look for people who can communicate clearly, both in person and online. Another key skill is the ability to keep learning. Technology changes so quickly that what you learn at university may be out of date in ten years. People who enjoy learning new things and adapting to change will find it easier to succeed. Learning foreign languages also opens doors, because many companies now work with partners all over the world.
