> Since the early 2020s, millions of people around the world have started working from home for at least part of the week. For some, it has been a dream come true; for others, it has created new problems. Emre, a software engineer from Eskişehir, is a big fan. “I used to spend almost two hours a day in traffic,” he explains. “Now I use that time to go running and cook proper meals. I also concentrate better because there are no interruptions from colleagues.” Emre’s company lets him work from home four days a week, and he only goes to the office for team meetings. Derya, who works in marketing in Istanbul, has a different opinion. She lives in a small flat with her husband and two children. “My kitchen table is my office, my children’s classroom and our dining room,” she laughs. “It is hard to separate work and family life. Sometimes I answer emails at eleven at night.” She also misses chatting with colleagues over lunch. Experts say that remote working works best when people have a quiet space, clear working hours and regular contact with their team. Many companies are now choosing a hybrid model, where employees divide their time between home and the office.
