When I started university in İzmir, I felt lonely. I didn't know anyone in the city, and I spent most evenings alone in my room. One day, I saw a poster on the noticeboard: the local animal shelter needed volunteers at weekends. I had always loved animals, so I decided to give it a try. On my first Saturday, I was given a pair of rubber boots and a list of jobs. I cleaned the dogs' cages, filled water bowls and prepared food. It was hard, dirty work, and I went home exhausted. But I also took a group of dogs for a walk in the nearby park, and I couldn't stop smiling. Over the next few months, I learned a lot. I learned how to approach a frightened dog slowly and how to give medicine to a cat that didn't want it. I also helped take photos of the animals for the shelter's website, because a good photo can help an animal find a new home. My favourite moment was when Fıstık, an old dog with three legs who had been at the shelter for two years, was finally adopted by a retired teacher. Volunteering didn't only help the animals; it helped me, too. I made friends with the other volunteers, and I no longer feel lonely.
