> Twenty years ago, nobody worked as a social media manager, an app developer or a cloud engineer. Experts predict that many of today’s primary school students will do jobs that haven’t been invented yet. So how can young people prepare for an unknown future? According to career advisers, technical knowledge alone is not enough. Employers increasingly look for “soft skills” such as creativity, problem-solving and the ability to work in a team. Learning how to learn is also essential, because people will probably change careers several times during their lives. In other words, curiosity may be the most valuable qualification of all.

1. Social media managers already existed twenty years ago. ( )
