> How many friends can a person really have? Some researchers suggest that our brains can manage about 150 meaningful relationships. However, these relationships are organized in layers. Most people have about five very close friends, about fifteen good friends, and around fifty friends they meet now and then. Moving someone from an outer layer to an inner one requires time: one study found that it takes roughly 200 hours together to turn an acquaintance into a close friend. This explains why friendships formed at school or university, where people spend many hours together, are often the strongest.
